Background:

Transfer Fees in Real Estate Transactions.

This analysis was prepared by non-partisan legislative staff for the use of legislative members in their deliberations. This analysis is not a part of the legislation nor does it constitute a statement of legislative intent.

A private transfer fee is a method through which the owner or developer of real property creates an ongoing stream of income by charging a fee on subsequent sales or other transfers of the property. Also called "capital recovery fees," transfer fees are largely applied to residential properties. Fees commonly are set as a percentage of the value of the property or purchase price at the time of transfer, or they may be fixed at a certain amount. For example, an agreement might call for a fee of 1 percent of the sales price per transfer during the first 99 years following the initial sale.

A developer might impose a transfer fee on a parcel of land by encumbering the title through a type of covenant in which the initial property buyer promises that the developer will receive a certain fee before the real estate is transferred to another party. These covenants remain part of the title to the property even when future owners possess the land.

In August 2010 the Federal Housing Finance Agency (FHFA) issued a proposed guidance that would bar Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac, and federal home-loan banks from investing in mortgages carrying private transfer fee covenants. According to the FHFA, fee covenants may: (1) increase the costs of homeownership; (2) make property transfers legally uncertain; (3) expose lenders and title companies to risks; (4) reduce transparency for consumers; and (5) have other adverse effects.

Transfer fees have been marketed as a way for developers to recoup capital improvement costs while selling properties, such as in a subdivision, for a lower initial cost.

Legal Doctrines in American Real Estate Law.

A fundamental concept in American property law is preservation of the "alienability" of land, or keeping the title to real estate free of legal restrictions imposed by past owners that would unreasonably impede the use of property by future owners. Common-law legal doctrines that may apply to the enforceability of transfer fee covenants include the following:

- "Touch and concern" test - To be valid under Washington law, covenants generally must meet the "touch and concern" test, meaning that the party imposing the restriction receives the benefit of the covenant on his or her own land.
- "Rule against perpetuities" - The "rule against perpetuities" requires covenants to "vest" within the life of someone alive at the time the covenant is formed, plus 21 years.

Transfer Fee Laws in Other States.

More than a dozen states have passed legislation curtailing or banning transfer fees. For example, Arizona prohibits transfer fee covenants, while California's law requires explicit disclosure of fee covenants to concerned parties through conspicuous documents in the public record.

Summary of Substitute Bill:

Intent.

The Legislature finds that transfer fee obligations violate state policy favoring marketability of real property and transferability of property free of title defects or unreasonable restraints on alienation. The Legislature declares that transfer fees may not bind later owners.

New Transfer Fee Agreements Prohibited.

Any transfer fee obligations recorded or entered into on or after the bill's effective date are nonbinding and unenforceable in the courts. If a party imposes a transfer fee on a parcel, he or she is liable for any damages resulting from the fee, including the amount of any fee paid by a party to a transfer, and all attorney fees, expenses, and costs incurred by a party in certain legal actions involving the fees. The requirements also apply to property transfers conducted in ways other than sales, such as gifts.

Requirements for Existing Fee Agreements.

Transfer fee obligations existing before the bill's effective date are not presumed to be valid and enforceable. Such obligations must be interpreted and enforced following principles of real estate, servitude, contract, and other laws, including restraints on alienation and the touch and concern doctrine.

People who receive money from transfer fee obligations imposed before the bill takes effect, called "payees," must record a document in the office of the recorder of deeds for each county in which real estate subject to transfer fee obligations is located before December 31, 2011. The document, called a "Notice of Private Transfer Fee Obligation," must include: (1) the amount of the fee or percentage of the sales price constituting the cost of the fee; (2) the date or circumstances under which the fee obligation expires, if any; (3) the name and address of the payee; (4) the acknowledged signature of the payee; and (5) the legal description of the real property burdened by the fee obligation. If a payee fails to file the document, the transfer fee obligation is not enforceable.

Exceptions.

These provisions do not apply to: (1) commissions payable to licensed real estate brokers for services rendered; (2) interests or charges payable by a borrower to a lender pursuant to a loan secured by a mortgage against property; (3) rent payable under a lease; (4) money payable to the holder of an option to purchase property or to the holder of a right of first refusal or first offer to purchase property for not exercising that right; (5) government taxes and fees; (6) fees payable to certain associations; (7) fees payable to certain non-profit corporations; (8) fees related to certain club memberships; and (9) fees for services performed by an association at the same time as the fee is charged.

Substitute Bill Compared to Original Bill:

Several provisions related to private transfer fee obligations imposed on contracts for sale of real property, written requests by real property owners for a description of the transfer fees required by an obligation, the filing of certain affidavits involving compliance with a requirement to provide notice of transfer fees to real property owners, and the elements required for recorded notices are struck from the underlying bill.

Technical changes are made and adds a severability clause.

Appropriation: None.

Fiscal Note: Preliminary fiscal note available.

Effective Date of Substitute Bill: The bill contains an emergency clause and takes effect immediately.

Staff Summary of Public Testimony:

(In support) Private transfer fees are a scheme by a private company to impose insidious private taxes upon homeowners every time they sell a piece of real property. Private homes may sell every seven or eight years. Homeowners cannot finance the fees. Nineteen states have already restricted private transfer fees and several are considering prohibitions. State laws should be uniform regarding transfer fees. This bill is important to realtors. Given current financial conditions, many people pursue mortgages insured by the Federal Housing Administration, which would be affected by the proposed FHFA guidance.

(Opposed) None.
