Public utility districts (PUDs), a type of special purpose district, are created by and for the communities they serve and may provide water, electricity, conservation, and telecommunications services. Washington has 28 PUDs that serve more than 2.2 million customers. A board of three elected commissioners manages each PUD. Commissioners serve staggered six-year terms.

Public utility districts may receive revenue from the following sources:

- service fees;
- property tax levies;
- general obligation funds;
- revenue bonds;
- special assessments; and
- special assessment bonds.

Currently, PUDs may include a request for voluntary contributions on their service billing statements for the purpose of assisting qualified low-income residential customers pay their electricity bills. Contributions are managed and distributed by one of the following entities:

- the district;
- the Department of Community, Trade and Economic Development (DCTED); or
- a charitable organization with the district's service area.
