Background: The Shoreline Management Act requires that a "development" conducted on the shorelines of the state be consistent with its policies and with the applicable guidelines, rules, or master program created under it.

In general, a development for which the cost or market value is greater than $2,500, or which materially interferes with the normal public use of the water or shorelines of, the state is considered to be a "substantial development." Several exceptions and clarifications to the definition of a substantial development are provided, including one for recreational docks. The construction of such a dock, including a community dock, is not considered to be a substantial development if it is designed for pleasure craft, non-commercial use for single or multi-family residences, and costs not more than $2,500. This exemption was, in the main, established in 1973.

A substantial development may not be undertaken on the shorelines of the state without a substantial development permit. Thus, an exemption from the definition of "substantial development" affords an exemption from the substantial development permit requirement.

Summary of Bill: The exemption from the definition of a substantial development provided by the Shoreline Management Act for a recreational dock is altered. The exemption now applies to the construction of such a dock, the cost of which does not exceed $10,000 (rather than $2,500, as under current law). However, San Juan County or a city or town located in San Juan County may reestablish the $2,500 version of the exemption by ordinance.

Appropriation: None.

Fiscal Note: Not requested.

Effective Date: Ninety days after adjournment of session in which bill is passed.

Testimony For: A substantial development permit is required for dock replacements. The cost of getting the permit may be thousands of dollars; it hardly makes the effort worthwhile.

Testimony Against: None.

Testified: Representative Kessler, prime sponsor; and Stephen Conner, Port Townsend Construction and Dock Company.
