Background: The Department of Fish and Wildlife is required to externally mark coho and chinook salmon that are released from the hatcheries and rearing ponds it operates to enable fishers to determine which salmon are hatchery origin and which are wild stock. The department was directed to begin the marking program with coho stock, which is currently being done. If there was mass marking of chinook salmon, fishers would be able to distinguish between hatchery origin chinook salmon and wild chinook salmon. The department is required to coordinate with other entities that produce hatchery coho and chinook salmon for release into public waters in order to provide protection to wild coho and chinook salmon.

Summary of Bill: The Department of Fish and Wildlife is directed to annually mass mark by June 30, 1999, all appropriate hatchery origin chinook salmon produced by the department beginning with the 1998 chinook brood. The department is required to work with the treaty Indian tribes in order to reach mutual agreement on the implementation of the mass marking program. The department must report to the Legislature by January 1, 1999, on its progress in reaching mutual agreement with the treaty Indian tribes and any Pacific coast state or province in achieving the goal of coast-wide marking of chinook and coho salmon.

Appropriation: None.

Fiscal Note: Available.

Effective Date: Ninety days after adjournment of session in which bill is passed. However, the bill is null and void unless funded in the budget.

Testimony For: (Natural Resources) Selective fisheries are the best hope for rebuilding salmon stocks. Time is of the essence. People need to be able to distinguish between wild stock and hatchery stock. Projections for returning chinook this year are dismal. If Puget Sound chinook are listed under the Endangered Species Act, little harvesting of hatchery fish will be allowed unless they are marked. The technology exists to mass mark chinook by machine. The agreement language about working with the tribes is important.

(Appropriations) The chinook mass marking program is a vital aspect to restore fish runs and commercial and recreational fishing in Washington. It will allow fishers to distinguish between endangered wild stocks while being able to catch hatchery stock.

Testimony Against: (Natural Resources) None.

(Appropriations) None.
