Background: The Involuntary Treatment Act allows a person to be detained for involuntary mental health treatment at a locked mental health facility if the person meets criteria for civil commitment. A commitment under the Involuntary Treatment Act must be initiated by a designated mental health professional (DMHP). In order to initiate a civil commitment a DMHP must find, following an investigation, that a person who is not willing to voluntarily seek mental health treatment presents, as a result of a mental disorder, a likelihood of serious harm or that the person is gravely disabled. A person presents a likelihood of serious harm when the person's behavior indicates a substantial risk that the person will inflict physical harm on himself or herself, another person, or the property of others. A person is gravely disabled when, as a result of a mental disorder, the person is in danger of serious physical harm resulting from a failure to provide for the person's essential human needs of health or safety, or manifests severe deterioration in routine functioning and is not receiving such care as is essential for the person's health or safety.

Once a DMHP initiates a civil commitment, the superior court in the county where the person is detained must hold a probable cause hearing within 72 hours to determine whether there is a basis to continue the involuntary mental health treatment. It is not uncommon for a person who is detained by a DMHP to be transported across county lines for treatment at an evaluation and treatment facility or state hospital. Individuals who are discharged from civil commitment sometimes receive a less restrictive order (LRO) or conditional release order specifying conditions of release, including cooperation with outpatient mental health treatment. Violation of the conditions of an LRO or conditional release order may provide the basis for a new episode of civil commitment, even when the person does not currently meet other civil commitment criteria.

Summary of Bill: The bill as referred to committee not considered.

Summary of Bill (Proposed Amendment): The Washington Institute for Public Policy must search for validated mental health tools for a DMHP to use when assessing persons for civil commitment.

In determining whether a person is gravely disabled or presents a likelihood of serious harm, the court or evaluating DMHP must consider the symptoms and behavior of the person in light of all available evidence or information concerning the person's historical behavior, as disclosed by the clinical record or credible witnesses with knowledge of the person.

Symptoms or behavior which standing alone would not justify civil commitment may support an inference of grave disability or likelihood of serious harm when: (1) such symptoms or behavior are closely associated with symptoms or behavior which preceded and led to a past incident of involuntary hospitalization, severe deterioration, or one or more violent acts; (2) these symptoms or behavior represent a marked and concerning change in the baseline behavior of the person; and (3) without treatment, the continued deterioration of the person is highly probable.

Whenever a person who is involuntarily committed for mental health treatment is discharged from an evaluation and treatment facility or a state hospital, the evaluation and treatment facility or state hospital must provide notice of the discharge, and a copy of any LRO or conditional release order, to the DMHP office in the county where the commitment was initiated, and the DMHP office in the county where the individual is expected to reside. The evaluation and treatment facility or state hospital need not send a copy of the LRO or conditional release order if it has entered into a memorandum of understanding obligating another entity to provide these documents. The notice and documents must be provided within one business day. The Department of Social and Health Services (DSHS) must maintain and make available an updated list of contact information for DMHP offices around the state.
