Background: In 1917, two sections of law were enacted relating to the acquisition of lands for Camp Lewis (now Fort Lewis). One of the sections had to do with the issuance of bonds, and the other with the procedure for appealing a property condemnation. In 1971, both of these sections were repealed. However, in that same year, each of the sections was also amended by other legislation that did not reflect the repeal. In each case, the amendments were purely technical. One of the 1971 amendments was simply a reenactment and merger of a prior double amendment. The other 1971 amendment merely added the phrase "or the court of appeals" as part of multiple amendments of the same nature that were made to many statutes throughout the code. Because of these amendments, the repealed sections were not removed from the code. Neither section, however, has any legal effect today.

Summary of Bill: Two formerly repealed and obsolete 1917 sections of law dealing with the acquisition of land for Fort Lewis are repealed.
